Blood Sugar Control Linked to Memory

So,  standuponit (<https://standuponit.livejournal.com/>), do we agree that your memory is plenty good enough? "The platypus who falls over never forgets" is an interesting motto, though.

If it were a workday, I'd bring you a doughnut.

(I reeeeeallly crave doughnuts. Have you ever made doughnuts?)

Huh. Interesting.

Yeah, memory is not my problem. Nor is high blood sugar....

Come on over. Bring T. I have Monty Python and The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. I'll make cinnamon cake doughnuts and you can watch me fold laundry while we all develop temporary British accents.

I'm headed for the door! Oh, wait, I'm still in my pajamas. Okay, slight delay. T. may come equipped with lesson plans and lecture notes, if she hasn't actually finished them already and is just rustling papers at the table to make me think she's being virtuous instead of doing the crossword. No, she must be working. She hasn't asked me for a seven-letter word for anything. g

You could wear your pajamas.

I think not (she said, and disappeared!). But they are my new sock monkey pajamas from T.

I have Monty Python and The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes.

I read this as one single title at first, and though that sounded absolutely fantastic. Now I will have to dream that such a thing exists.

I did the same, and spent a moment wondering how this particular morsel of British surrealist humor managed to escape me. There was a moment of disappointment when I realized that it didn't. I'll dream with you about it.

The Firesign Theatre, which I suspect you will like if you like Monty Python, however (they are sort of the American radio drama version), does have The Giant Rat Of Sumatra.

... Apparently we're misreading all around, for I read that as "The Giant Rat of Kama Sutra".
